

This conference attempts to compare missionaries' roles as local agents in different social environments across the Asian continent. We aim at testing the hypothesis that, no matter whether in the Middle East or South Asia, missionaries' options for action in localities under non-Christian authorities were strongly defined by the respective communicative setting.

The panels of the conference will be organized according to different communicative settings — household, rural, urban, court — rather than geographical regions. They will explore the distinctive options for action these settings provided to the missionaries.
